Hey there << Test First Name >> again, Jac here.

I laid in bed.

It was 6am.

And I really didn't want to move.

I was non-stop doing all the things that other people needed. All my energy going to meeting their needs before they even knew they needed that thing. I didn't stop long enough to know what I actually needed myself.

And I really felt in my gut there was something more for me...

I knew there was a huge to-do list waiting for me, boring work I had to get done... and I was just going through the motions, honestly...

I had a heap of bills to sort out and we were drowning in debt. We were just treading water in this mundane groundhog day of doing life, but not really living it.

It was a Tuesday in 2015.

I'd been blindly sucked into what I now call the "runway taxi" where I had made promises to myself to take off towards a possible career in the design industry, but life presented several rude awakenings to steer me off course. Namely: my husband left me abruptly just as I had commenced full time study in UX Design, with several months of study still ahead of me and rent to pay.

Should I pack up my life in the Melbourne apartment and head back to a corporate gig? Could I swallow the regret?

No way...

This was me 7 years ago. And I'm SO glad I didn't go back to the corporate world and pack in the dream...

I ended up finding lifelong friends from my studies and crystallising a new way to see the world and solve problems in it. I doubled my salary after 3 months of study. And then went on to build a leadership career and triple my salary within 6 years... My childhood goals of a $100K office job quickly faded away and I saw the real possibility of being Jacinta, a CEO and change maker.

Over the last 7 years, I learned a lot of what I now get to share with people in my Frankly Human community to help them get to where I am much faster.

Would you like to take off in a purposeful direction...?

Check out these kind words from Cath in my Frankly Human community. Equipped with their purpose statement, action plan and personal values from the Why Workshop not too long ago, she too is well on her way :-)
